Rival public companies include AT&T, Verizon, Sprint and T-Mobile. Amazon has been the subject of numerous antitrust investigations by federal and state authorities. And some competitors, like Google and Microsoft, have an interest in ensuring free and open access to the Internet. But antitrust experts said it is unlikely that Amazon, which enjoyed brisk sales growth in 2010 and is now the world's largest retailer, would seek to do anything that would depress sales of other products. "I think it's a big stretch to believe that Bezos and Amazon are going to try to shut down Google's Internet access or break up the email market," said Fred Turner, a professor at the University of Georgia and a longtime antitrust scholar. Rather, he said, "They're already getting most of the low-hanging fruit from the antitrust world." Jason Kint, a professor at the Harvard Kennedy School and an antitrust scholar, said that if he were in Jeff Bezos's shoes, he would be looking to expand Amazon's business. "If he thought that the best way to do that is by reducing access to other services, I think he would," Mr. Kint said. "But I don't think he would be looking to get rid of the Internet." Some antitrust experts have suggested that the harsh rhetoric of Senator Joe "Cyber-bullying" Lieberman and others partly
